LITTLE FABLES OF THE RISING YOUNG MAN

TWO CHAPS AND THE WAY THEY SPENT THEIR EVENINGS.

ONCE there was a certain Rising Young Man who worked away at his job each day, and when evening came felt like the schoolboy who lets out a lusty yell and hurls his books aside as soon as he has cleared the confines of his "prison." He was at the office every day, and he got there on time, too, did this Rising Young Man in question. He didn't take more time for his lunch than the law allows, and he didn't take a job a bit more than any of the other fellows in the office. He'd been with the firm three years now, with but one raise in salary—and all alone, he thought, he'd been growing more valuable to them without consistent recognition of that fact manifesting itself in his pay envelope. Hence, he argued, he would give them just the amount of work they paid him for—no more, no less. His evenings were his own, he was free. He must have a good time in them.

So, like many another Rising Young Man, and some who haven't even bobbed up above the surface for a second or so as yet, he devoted his evenings to pleasure. To stay in his room for an entire evening was to him an impossibility. He must be out and going and doing something—even though it might be nothing more exciting than loitering at the cigar store on the corner and talking with the other idle ones.

He made many engagements, days and days ahead. They were not all questionable ones, either. Many of them were for entertainment no more harmful than dances, parties or social received only one raise. But that did not worry him. He'd give them more work than they paid for, he argued, and eventually they simply couldn't help seeing how valuable he was. To him work, and getting along in the world were the things of paramount importance.

So he spent his evenings in grinding and plugging away. He studied his business. Everything that could be pored over at night that would help him in his work was his to peruse, he argued. To be out of his room for an entire evening doing nothing but having a good time was to him an impossibility. He must be busy. He must be trying to get along in the world. He must never be idle.

"I work eight hours a day at the office," he said, disconsolately. "And I am supposed to sleep eight hours. That leaves only eight hours each day for my own work—for the accomplishment of my own ambitions, for the making of my own career. Just think of it—I've lost two thirds of my life so far in sleep and working for somebody else!" Now, of course, both of these cases are extreme. And both Rising Young Men are wrong. Chap No. 1 is frittering his time away in the foolish pursuit of entertainment. But Chap No. 2 is making of himself a one-sided man. He's losing the little pleasures and entertainments in life intended as mental and physical aids. He's a "Jack" who's going to discover himself a "dull boy" in all but one subject one of these days.

The Festive Pumpkin

any hasty retreats on the eventful night. The up-to-date Halloween house depends more upon pumpkins than she does upon the icecream, the popcorn, the fudge or any of the other necessities of the frolic at the end of Indian summer. A substitute might be found for any of the eatables, but there is no substitute for the pumpkin as a Halloween decoration. Most of the pumpkins that thus go to add to the jollity of the occasion are the bonafide products of the farm, but of late years make-believe pumpkins have made their appearance at many an entertainment. It is that they fill a special niche in the scheme of things rather than that they have been required by any shortage of the real pumpkin crop. The situation may be explained by an example. Your ingenious hostess employs the real pumpkins—halved, or with an opening at the top, or slashed with the outlines of Jack's visage—so shaded for the candles that are deemed to give sufficient illumination for such a spooky occasion, but she has miniature pumpkins fashioned from colored cardboard as place cards at the supper table, and the favors for the guests are candy boxes in the form of pumpkins and filled with pumpkin-colored candy. It might be supposed that a Jack-o'-Lantern is a Jack-o'-lantern, and that there is very little difference between the reincarnated pumpkins, but any student of this class of sculpture can assure you that there are wide differences that distinguish the different "schools." The boys, whose sole thought is of the impression to be made by the flaming countenance looking out from the pumpkin bestow all their thought upon the facial features that are to be thrown into relief by the candle light from inside the pumpkin, whereas the hostess whose pumpkin sentries are posted in well lighted rooms is wont to embellish a plain countenance with black or white eyebrows and mustaches and other supposedly life-like touches.

West Point Run by Electricity

and wringers are run by that motive power. It has even found its way into the linen room, which is in charge of a sweet-faced old lady, whose sewing machine is run by electricity. Fifty tables are supplied each day with a fresh, clean cloth and napkins, and no little care is required to keep them in repair. "A stitch in time saves nine" is this little lady's motto and she is ever on the alert for a broken thread or a loose stitch. Several young ladies are her assistants and they are kept busy hemming and patching, for the bed linen and towels come under her supervision as well.

All the linen used at West Point is especially designed for the academy and has the coat-of-arms of the institution woven in the center of each piece. The cadets dine with the same discipline as characterizes any other part of their work at the academy and there is no straggling in after the meal begins. The mess hall is well lighted and has plenty of sunshine. The coat-of-arms is over the door and pictures of noted generals adorn the wall. Dinner is always served in the middle of the day.

Altogether the mess at West Point is a splendid example of electricity as a labor-saving power in the preparation of food, and the methods of putting it into effect shows the advantage of military discipline even in a kitchen.

Old Methods of Taxation.

There are many today to rail at the taxation, but they can feel somewhat elated when they learn of the old time methods of taxation. Henry VIII taxed boards and this tax was paid according to the financial condition of the wearer. Elizabeth, likewise, taxed every beard of two weeks' growth. In 1695 a law was passed in England to the effect that the parents of every child born should be taxed. If a duke became the proud father of a child he was taxed about one hundred dollars. A laborer in the same predicament—a father—was only taxed two shillings.

Bachelors and "old maids" were forced to pay a tax for the privilege of being single and a married man was forced to pay a tax for being married. When a person died his relatives were forced to pay a tax because he died. The rulers thus received an income from each birth and each death. It was due to William Pitt that the widow tax was instituted. In those days there was a tax on hair powder, watches and clocks and a man who sold hats had to pay a monthly license.
